

Canada's Security is at Risk, and It's Time to Take It Seriously

Justin Trudeau is not serious about Canada's economic and national security. We are in a time of unprecedented global instability resulting in fundamental shifts in the world economy, while trade relationships and defence structures are under threat – and Canada needs to take it seriously.

- Canada's economic security and national security go hand in hand, and both face threats.
- This Liberal Government has signed a trade deal that fails to guarantee stability and constrains our sovereignty, while failing to address punishing national security tariffs on steel and aluminum and imposing regulations that cripple Canada's ability to build pipelines.
- The resulting job losses at Bombardier and General Motors, and the crisis in Alberta's energy sector, are recent examples of what's becoming a dangerous trend.
- Canada's security is increasingly under threat from credit card, bank data and intellectual property hacks, from foreign actors like Russia and China.
- Justin Trudeau has paid lip service with token gestures against cyber attacks, the refusal of security reviews of critical foreign takeovers and the failure to invest in a sovereign and secure digital infrastructure.
- The Liberals have failed to deliver equipment for Canada's military with spending that falls short by $2.5 billion and the purchase of used Australian fighters that have less capability than the ones the Canada Air Force is so desperate to replace.
- Delays on naval ships, icebreakers and arctic patrol ships, combined with our lack of under under-ice submarine capabilities, puts our arctic sovereignty in peril.

As your Member of Parliament, I am interested in your feedback. What ideas do you have to help strengthen Canada's national and economic security?

Send me a message at

Leona. Alles lev@parl.gc.ca